

Brigitte Latzko is a full Professor for Psychology in School in the Department of Education at the University of Leipzig in Germany. She received her Ph.D. in Developmental and Educational Psychology (2001) from the Ruprecht-Karls University Heidelberg, Germany and her habilitation degree in 2010 from the University of Leipzig. Her research interests include the development of emotional autonomy, concepts of authority and moral emotions, in particular moral emotions of at-high-risk children. Based on the findings on her research projects she draws a theoretical framework of how teachers can foster moral development in their classroom and what is more, how teacher themselves can develop their professional ethos. She is committed in teacher trainings for moral and value education. Furthermore she focuses on diagnostic skills of teachers and is highly engaged in transferring psychological theory into educational practice. The overall aim of her research activity is to contribute to teachers' professional development. Among her publications are monographs and training materials for teachers as well as papers in national journals and international edited books.
